

Question:

Corrected Answer:

The diagram depicts the procedures a hydroelectric power station undergoes to produce electricity. It is clear from the diagram that in order to generate electricity, the hydroelectric power station keeps on working in a reverse direction at night.

According to what is shown, there are two phases that contribute in producing electricity. As for the first phase which takes place during the day, when the dam collects enough amount of water, the water flow into a reversible turbine. The turbine passes some of the water into a low-level reservoir, while the other part is used by the generator in the power station to generate electricity as power lines used by the national grid.

Moreover, at night, the water in the low-level reservoir passes through the power station, where the turbines pump the water into the high-level reservoir.

To sum up, we could say that the reversible turbines in the power station, operate as a generator during the day, while at night it serves as a pumper.
