

Using Indeed In Your Job Search

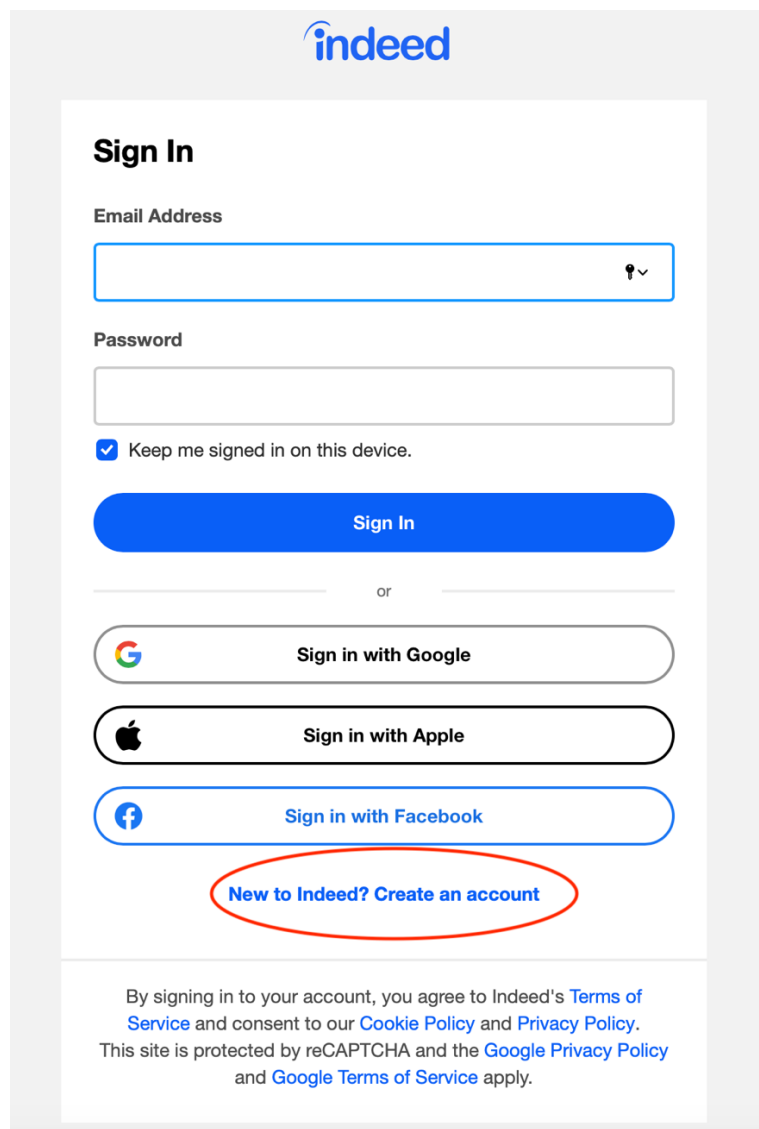

Indeed bills itself as “the #1 job site in the world.” Indeed is more than a job search board. It’s a tool you can use in your job search. It can be especially valuable in a passive job search, delivering job opportunities to your email each day.

The first step is to create an Indeed account. It’s free, and setting it up will take just a few minutes.

On the Indeed.com home page, click the “Sign In” link.

That will take you to a login screen. On that page, click “New to Indeed? Create an account.”

You'll be prompted to "Add a resume." Don't do it.

Do not upload your resume to your Indeed profile. Instead, customize your resume for the specific position you're applying for. You can still use the "easy apply" option available on job postings by uploading a specific resume for a specific job. You'll get a better match with applicant tracking systems if you tailor the resume for the job posting.

Add a resume

Apply to jobs easier and get found by employers faster.

By continuing, you agree to create a public resume and agree to receiving job opportunities from employers.

In addition, if you upload a resume, your resume is public by default and may be viewed by anyone accessing the website. Indeed's terms and conditions page says "this includes users of Indeed's Resume Search product, Employers whose Company Page you may be following, and anyone with access to the URL associated with your public resume, such as search engines and other third parties that may crawl our Site. We offer you this visibility to help you find a job."

If you're conducting a confidential job search, posting your resume may tip off your employer that you're looking for a new role. That's another good reason not to upload a resume.

After continuing on, you'll be prompted to confirm your email account.

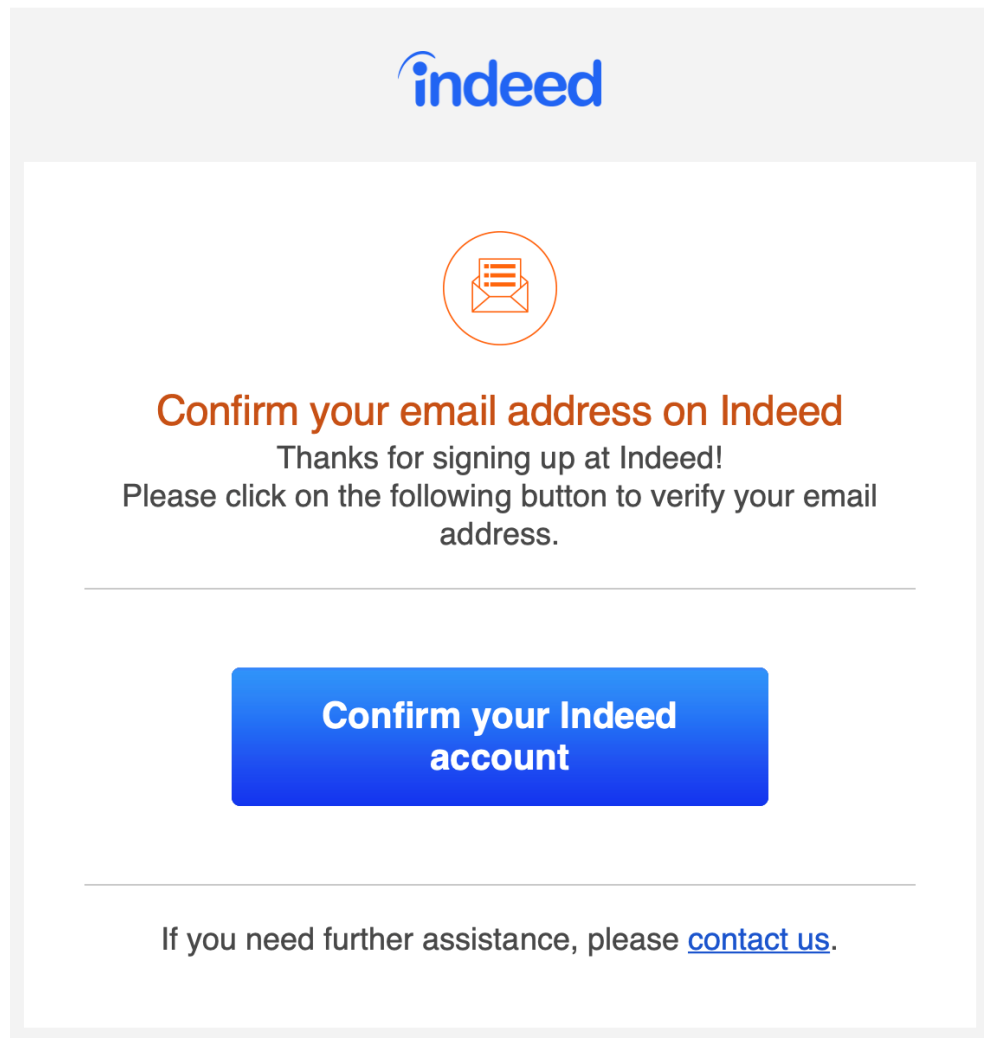

Your email address is not confirmed

Click on the link and you'll receive an email with a button you'll need to click to complete the confirmation:

And once you click on the link, you'll get a confirmation message:

Use Indeed Search to Identify Possible Matches

Indeed's search function is robust. You can search for possible job opportunities by location, distance, industry, job title, experience level, salary, and more.

You can use Indeed's filters to refine your search parameters, adding or removing criteria until you find positions that are a good fit for your skills, education, and experience.

To get started using Indeed search, click on the "Find jobs" link in the menu bar.

The default search is "What" (job title, keywords, or company) and "Where" (city, state, zip code, or "remote").

Some Company Pages are more complete than others. Salary and benefit information is user-submitted, so the more employees the company has, the more likely this information is to be populated on the page.

Indeed also conducts surveys on work happiness. It evaluates several criteria:

- Work Happiness Score: Do people feel happy at work most of the time?
- Flexibility: Do people feel they have the time and location flexibility they need?
- Achievement: Do people feel they are achieving most of their goals at work?

The Work Happiness section will tell you how many people completed the work happiness survey, so you can see the sample size the scores are based on.
